

Through Afghanistan

Afghanistan is not an easy country to understand straightaway, if ever at all. It is a curious enigma of a country. But, if we are honest, we have come to see it through some very narrow and far away binoculars. The country that you do not find on news reports also happens to be one endowed with its share of great natural beauty and hospitable people, both probably more striking than many other countries on earth. It was still Afghanistan though. No one recommended going there. No one was supposed to go there on their own. This book penetrates a relatively unknown country, starting from the Iranian border and finishing down the Khyber Pass into Pakistan. It casts light on a part of the world about which we have heard a lot, but, in reality, know little because it remains off limits for many. It reveals a land of distinct beauty, scenery as beautiful as it is remote, and unparalleled ruin. In spite of a catalogue of physical challenges and inconveniences, the journey traverses a stretch of the earth's surface encompassing hostile deserts and up to the fringes of the Himalayas. A bold, thrilling and compelling journey. Nancy Hatch Dupree wrote in A Historical Guide to Afghanistan: Only the adventurous should set out to cross Afghanistan via the Central Route. Even these adventurous souls are entreated to make sure they have a hardy vehicle, or preferably two, hardy drivers...and, above all, an infinite enthusiasm for roughing it. This said, may I assure the properly prepared and equipped that the trip is highly rewarding and guaranteed to be memorable. Note, furthermore, that this route is normally only open from approximately June through October. It was the middle of November. There was no turning back. The combination of the intimidating and the enthralling enticed me in, almost straight away. One way or another, I had to make my way through Central Afghanistan. For all the forgotten people of Afghanistan. There are many. Chapter 1 of Through Afghanistan A soldier with a big black beard, and an even bigger gun, marched on to my bus and shouted some orders. We were only a few hundred metres inside Afghanistan, after leaving the Iranian border post behind us. There was no turning back now. All around me, outside the windows, a swirling sea of humanity and vehicles surged towards our bus. It felt personal.
