

Kicking Off in North Korea: Football and Friendship in Foreign Lands

Hartley writes with wisdom and passion as he shares his world in these thoroughly entertaining travel diaries. Huw Edwards Travel junkie Tim Hartley is a man with a thirst for understanding the modern world, or worlds, we live in. He is equally at home herding reindeer with the last of the Sami people or watching football in a silent crowd of 50,000 in North Korea. Whether he is getting lost in a favela in Brazil or taking his mum back to the Cheltenham Ladies College, Hartley casts a piercing and sometimes judgmental eye on the kaleidoscopic world around him. Kicking off in North Korea is one mans attempt to make sense of globalisation, his beloved game of football and his own place in the world. Hartley can be serious when he is discussing blood feuds in Albania and hilarious when he does Mexico in five-star luxury with his wife. We meet his seven-year-old son Chester for a childs-eye view of the Palestinian question in Beirut and then follow them both to east London twelve years later where the son has a lesson for his dad. In these uplifting travel diaries Hartley crosses the world in search of authentic stories and people. More often than not he finds them.
