

The Quilotoa Loop, Ecuadors Hidden Treasure

The Quilotoa area, high up in the Andes of South America, lies about 43 miles or 70 kilometers southwest of Quito, Ecuador, as the crow flies. Though I lived in Ecuador for over three years, I never heard of these majestic mountains and villages surrounding the Quilotoa crater lake, a magnificent sight that inspires breathtaking awe, right up there with Niagara Falls, the Grand Canyon, the Sahara Desert, and other wonders of the world. Most foreigners who live in Ecuador have never heard of it. Most surprisingly, even many Ecuadorians I've met draw a blank when I mention this hidden treasure. So when Nate, a professional photographer (whose website is www.nateinecuador.com), suggested we collaborate on a book about this largely unknown spot, I readily agreed. We invited our friend Peggy to go with us. Join us on our journey! You can come along vicariously and enjoy the 49 stunning photos in this book. Our mission with this photo book is to enlighten as many people as possible about this beautiful area. If you can handle the altitude, you don't have to be a fit hiker to enjoy this area. You can still see most of the sights by taking a bus or car... or even riding a horse! You may even be inspired to go there yourself. When you get ready to make this trip, there are some points to be aware of. The last ATM machine you'll find is in Latacunga. Also, be prepared to get unplugged! Many of these villages have no Internet, while for those that do, the connection is sketchy and very slow. (In two weeks, there were only two days I could answer a few emails.) Even cell phone connections are unreliable.

Be aware of the Ecuadorian tradition that when you book a room at a hostel, you usually pay per person rather than per room. So often it's just as cheap for a couple to have separate rooms, great to know if one of them snores! The hostels are inexpensive but often not what you may be used to. Bring sandals for when you shower. That's a lesson I learned in my 20s after getting athlete's foot in a hotel shower. To this day I get occasional flare ups! Bring a warm sweater or better yet, don't. You'll be overwhelmed with inexpensive alpaca sweaters for sale. Be sure to bring raingear, gloves, sunscreen, hiking boots, and of course, a camera. If you bring a phone, get Claro rather than Movistar. In some of the villages, Claro is the only cell phone that has reception. Bring plenty of cash, and especially small bills like $10 or under. Change is hard enough to get in Cuenca (the third largest city of Ecuador) but even scarcer higher up in the Andes. Credit cards are almost never accepted. Note that when I don't list the hostel address, it's because the village is so small, there is no address (or none required). You'll find the place easily enough due to the size of the town. Also note that that your mileage may vary my pedometer readings may be a bit off, making the mileage as much as 10 to 15% higher. Time is the most important variable: figure that it takes about an hour to go a mile due to the uneven terrain.
