This is the first part of The Mekong Exploration Commission Report (1866-1868), one of the most important expeditions sent to the Indo-China region to explore trade routes. The French expedition compiled a wealth of new information, drew maps, and produced a substantial number of engravings of Laos. It ended in Luang Prabang where the Commission stayed some months. While the original objective to ascertain that the Mekong River could be used as a trade route between Yunnan and the Delta was not achieved, the Commissions political and socio-economic information was invaluable for Frances expansion in Indochina. A new map of Indochina as surveyed by the Commission is included in this book. 44 pp. of illustrations, 1 map.
